Trump 2.0

Trump's emphatic victory in the US presidential election, victory for the Republicans in the Senate (and likelihood that they will win a majority in the House of Representatives too) provide a powerful platform for President-elect Trump to conduct his economic policies. He has pledged to extend the 2017 tax cuts beyond 2025, averting the risk of a 'fiscal cliff', and corporate taxes are likely to be cut, both of which should support private domestic demand.

What is less certain is to what extent Trump will enact various tariff measures to support domestic industry and help finance tax-cuts. In his previous administration, Trump shied away from indiscriminate blanket tariff increases, which are widely deemed to be bad for the economy, and instead adopted more targeted industry-specific tariffs. To implement blanket tariffs of 60-200% on Chinese goods, 25% on Mexico and 10% on the rest of the world as threatened would be a radically untested strategy. For markets it will be critical to see how tariff policy evolves. For now, though, the major export economies of Asia and Europe are concerned about how tariffs could hurt their open economy trading models. The ECB has spoken of how tariffs would be damaging, and the expectation is that the negative growth impact from such measures could force interest rates lower. If blanket tariffs are implemented, it is uncertain just how much of the pain will be worn by the US consumer, how much by the importer and how much by the exporter, but it wouldn't be a good news story for US inflation nor the global growth outlook.

New Zealand's trade exposure to the US is meaningful, accounting for around 13% of our goods exports ($8.8bn in the year to September) and 25% of our services exports ($7.4bn in the year to June).

To the extent that a Trump presidency represents wider-for-longer US fiscal deficits, long-term yields in the US could be higher than otherwise. And given the propensity for the US Treasury market to influence long-end yields in NZ, this could have implications for the New Zealand taxpayer. That is, higher-than-otherwise government bond yields represent a higher-than-otherwise cost to service Government debt (which exploded under the previous Government). And with this week's financial statements of the New Zealand Government for the three months to September showing the weaker economy beginning to weigh on the fiscals, the recent rise in bond yields following the US election outcome comes at an unfortunate time. Compared to our recent fiscal musings, risks are now looking skewed towards a slightly larger upgrade to NZDM's bond issuance guidance come HYEPU. However, both the extent of downgrade to the economic and fiscal outlook, and the Finance Minister's reaction to that are key uncertainties. NZDM also got a $1.3bn head start on 2024/25 fiscal year funding, so it's not one-way traffic.

Labour market forecast update

The Q3 labour market release was close to our expectation, with the unemployment rate rising 0.2%pts to 4.8%, employment contracting (as labour demand continues to soften) and the participation rate falling (as opportunities in the labour market continue to fade).

With the Q3 data in the bag, we have updated our outlook for the labour market. Compared to our previously published forecast, changes to our unemployment rate forecast are relatively minor.

Demand for labour is clearly very weak, with annual employment growth turning negative for the first time since the Global Financial Crisis in Q3. Given the typical lag between activity and employment, our forecast is for more weakness to come.

On the supply side, softer domestic economic momentum is eroding opportunities in the labour market, and as a result the net migration cycle appears to be turning quickly (we'll get another read on migration next week). Slowing growth in the working-age population means the loosening we're seeing in the labour market is now being driven less by the supply side and more by weak demand for labour. Like migration, the participation rate also has a cyclical component to it, typically falling when opportunities in the labour market become scarce. We continue to expect that increasing competition in the labour market will see the number of available-but-not-actively-looking potential jobseekers (aka discouraged workers) rise, pushing the participation rate lower as employment growth softens further.

Figure 2 shows how this is all expected to net out. We expect the unemployment rate to rise to 5.1% in Q3, peaking at 5.5% in the middle of 2025 before gradually declining to 4.8% by the end of 2026 as the withdrawal of monetary restraint facilitates a modest recovery. Compared to the RBNZ's August MPS forecast, we expect the unemployment rate to peak slightly higher (5.5% vs 5.4%), but that's neither here nor there when it comes to monetary policy implications.

Turning to the outlook for wages, further slowing in annual wage growth is expected as the labour market loosens and bargaining power shifts further from workers towards firms. We expect annual growth in the Labour Cost Index (productivity adjusted, all salary and wage rates) to slow from 3.3% y/y in Q3 2024 to just below 2% by the end of 2025. That's a touch below the historical average pace of around 2.2% and consistent with non-tradables inflation slowing adequately to keep headline CPI inflation around the centre of the 1-3% target band over the medium term. See page 4 for our updated forecasts (figure 6 and in table).

Interest rate markets

It's been a volatile week in interest rate markets locally and globally. US markets led the move as a Trump win looked increasingly likely, and while US bond yields there have retraced from highs in the past 24hrs, local rates haven't followed suit. Instead, the more balanced tone taken by both the Fed and Bank of England have led to unwinding of wagers on aggressive RBNZ cuts here, leaving rates higher. We remain comfortable with our call for a 50bp cut later this month but do expect the pace of easing to slow into 2025, and markets are gradually moving to embrace that view.

FX markets

Volatility has also been seen in FX markets, with the Kiwi struggling initially in the face of the USD's rebound, only to come back later. Better economic data and a higher-for-longer policy rate vibe does play into the USD's favour, but there is still a lot of policy uncertainty, and volatility may trump direction.

Key data summary

RBNZ Financial Stability Report – November. A good read (as always), but a non-event for markets on the day.

ANZ Commodity Price Index – October. The ANZ World Commodity Price Index increased 1.4% m/m in October.

Global Dairy Trade auction. The Global Dairy Trade Price Index lifted 4.8%, a stronger result than anticipated. Whole milk powder prices lifted 4.4%, while skim milk powder gained 4.0%.

Labour Market Statistics – Q3. The unemployment rate rose to 4.8%. See our Review.

The week ahead

RBNZ Inflation Expectations – Q4 (Monday 11 November, 3:00pm).

CPI inflation subsequently came in marginally below median analyst expectations last quarter, suggesting near-term expectations could fall. But the more meaningful measure for the RBNZ is the 2-year (and beyond), which came in very close to 2% in Q3.

ANZ Truckometer – October (Tuesday 12 November, 10:00am).

Electronic Card Transactions – October (Tuesday 12 November, 10:45am). ANZ card spending data suggest a small monthly rise (~0.3%) is on the cards.

Net Migration – September (Wednesday 13 November, 10:45am).

We expect the annual net inflow will continue to fall and will be watching to see whether monthly departures have indeed past the peak.

Selected Price Indexes – October (Thursday 14 November, 10:45am). A seasonal fall in food prices (-0.7% m/m), a 0.3% m/m rise in rents, higher petrol prices (+0.9% m/m), and a lift in accommodation and airfares are expected to net out as a 0.1% lift in our estimated weighted SPI index. This would be consistent with our Q4 CPI pick of 0.4% q/q.

Manufacturing PMI – October (Friday 15 November, 10:30am). Has been steadily recovering since July, though remains very weak. Another lift in October would be reassuring.

REINZ House Prices – October (11-15 November, 9:00am). The REINZ House Price Index surprisingly lifted last month, though given underlying momentum remains subdued, that may have been more "noise" than "signal". Let's see what October brings.
